The wealthier continued to lead Fontes by 943,452 votes to 938,800 votes, a difference of 4,652 votes. Richer was ahead by 3,323 votes when the county released an update Tuesday night. He took the lead for the first time in saturday's race. At one point On Thursday morning, Richer fell behind by more than 37,000 votes. Maricopa County released another 13,362 election results in Wednesday's update. There are just under 6,700 ballots left to be reported in the county, according to a vote tracking the progress of the Arizona Secretary of State's Office. Unseeded Republican Helen Purcell, who has been in office since 1988, took office in the 2016 election. Follow @KTAR923 we found that JavaScript is disabled in this browser. Jen Fifield Help Center | Arizona Republic Maricopa County voters elected Republican Stephen Richer, a private lawyer with a background in public policy, as the county's new recorder to help oversee county elections. The wealthier defeated current Democratic recorder Adrian Fontes in an election November 3. I get to work and you take pride, Richer told voters on Thursday, adding that he hopes to improve confidence in the voting process and serve all of Maricopa County's 4.5 million residents. With Richer stepping into his role on January 1, the Republican will be back in charge county elections after Fontes, in 2016, became the first Democrat to lead the office in decades. Fontes' tenure was short but consequential. He has driven massive changes in the way counties vote, such as eliminating the use of allocated polling places in favor of polling centers where anyone can cast a ballot, and expanding early voting options. Fontes' decision prompted some errors, legal challenges and criticism that he ignored the spirit of the law in favor of party priorities. Richer told voters during his campaign that he would take politics and controversy out of office. Fontes admits how the final vote will come as InFontes conceded on Thursday, although the county still has about 6,700 votes to count since Wednesday night. The wealthier currently leads Fontes by 4,652 votes, out of more than 2 million. Fontes initially held a wide lead over Richer, but that changed as more results came in as Richer took the lead on Saturday. Fontes received praise from many on social media for grasthly conceding the race. He'd posted on Twitter: I called @Richer4Recorder congratulate him, and would welcome Maricopa's 30th goal of the year. #ProtectDemocracy. Fontes said he knew the race was going to be tight, but it was unfortunate how the results turned out. He said he was proud of his campaign team and his staff who led the election. I don't want my personal political defeat overshadowed by the amazing success we've achieved in office and in elections, he said. Steven Slugocki, Maricopa County Democratic Party chairman, said Thursday that Fontes' departure is a huge loss to the county. (Voters) didn't know the incredible improvements that Adrian had made in a system that completely changed voting in the county, he said. Fontes changed how Maricopa County votesAlong with the help of the county's Board of Supervisors to run elections, recorder office records, tracks and provides public access to documents such as deeds and property maps. Fontes defeated longtime Republican front-rower Helen Purcell in 2016 on a promise to restore voter confidence after a botched 2016 presidential election in which voters had to wait hours to vote at their polling stations. He has mostly achieved his goals of simplifying the voting process and eliminating long waiting times. Under his leadership, the county has improved voter access by updating its technology so that voter registration and information are reflected live when they get to the polling station, improve election security, make the electoral table transparent and make the transition to polling stations. His experiments led to some technical glitches and long queues in the 2018 primary election, and caused controversy between him and Arizona Attorney General Mark Brnovich and the District Board of Supervisors - so much so that the Republican-controlled council recently took back control of the election day vote, leaving Fontes to steer voters, and early voting. This year, Fontes and the board had to make a quick decision on how to protect the health of voters and election workers, as COVID-19 spreads in the county. For the general election, officials quickly secured new polling stations that could accommodate social distancing. Overall, there were no widespread problems with access to voting or technology. Voters for the first time in history in the county could go to polling centers to vote in person starting about a month before Election Day, and the county added more voting drop-off options. All this combined meant a record amount of early voting that helped soften the lines on Election Day. Several changes that Fontes made leading up to this election have been challenged in court. An Arizona Supreme Court judge ruled in September that Fontes' instructions on how voters should exceed errors on their ballots were illegal, and a judge ordered him to correct the guidelines before the November election. Fontes won another court battle that challenged the use of virtual voting by his office during the COVID-19 pandemic for voters with mobility problems or severe illnesses. The wealthier watch Fontes' leadRicher waged a fierce campaign in which he consistently broadcast what he saw as Fontes' failure. Richer said Fontes' changes were illegal and unsuccessful. He says Fontes is uncivil and too partisan to run an office that plays such an important role in protecting democracy. But after Fontes called him to concede on Thursday morning, Richer changed the tone. He thanked Fontes, and said he appreciated how hard Fontes worked during his time in office. He said he will partly lean on him, along with county officials and former recorder Helen Purcell, to transition into his new role. I'm going into this with a lot of humility, he said. Who's Stephen Richer? Richer plans to step down from his job as a lawyer for Lewis Roca Rothgerber Christie in downtown Phoenix so he can focus on learning the recorder role. He previously worked in business management and public policy, including think tanks such as the American Enterprise Institute and the Cato Institute.He participated in the arizona humanities, arizona chamber of commerce and industry and federalist society's Phoenix Lawyers chapter. Richer said he helped on some political campaigns in Arizona and elsewhere, but it was his first run for office. How richer will the election change? He said he is running for fair and competent elections, and wants voters to have confidence in the voting process. One way he would take politics out of his position, he said before he was elected, would be to form a supervisory board, occupied by people from all political parties. He also said he would develop strong relationships with the Board of Supervisors and Secretary of State Katie Hobbs.Richer said it would make public documents more accessible, including by publishing every request for records and its results he said he was concerned about what Richer's victory might mean for the county election. He said that hopefully he is not trying to restruct access to the vote. Richers said his main goal would be to stay away from the controversy. As much as I can post the news I hope I'm not a regular subject of reporting, he said. Contact a reporter jen.fifield@azcentral.com or at 602-444-8763. Follow her on Twitter @JenAFifield.
